GENERAL ELECTION
Results in Sound and Television

Polling Day is Thursday, May 26, and on that night and the following day results will be broadcast in the Home Service, the Light Programme, and on Television as they are received. Full details of the BBC's plans for these broadcasts are given on page 3.

‘Radio Times’ Election Chart
In this issue is a three-page chart for the benefit of listeners who wish to record the results. It lists the 630 constituencies in alphabetical order and in the form in which their names will be announced over the air.
Broadcasting the General Election Results

WHEN the polling booths close at nine o'clock on Thursday evening everything will be in readiness for the start of the complex broadcasting operation which will cover the entire country, from London to the remote corners of the Old Kingdom. The General Election with the least possible delay, together with periodic announcements of the state of the parties, will be the first concern of the newsroom at BBC headquarters, where results will be received and interpreted by the General Election with the least possible delay, together with periodic announcements of the state of the parties, analysis and interpretation of the results by expert statisticians and commentators, and Election news from various parts of the country.

The first result is expected to flicker over the tapes in the newsroom at BBC headquarters about 90 minutes after the close of the poll. At the last Election four results were received before 11 p.m.; by midnight the total had risen to 105. In the next two hours 178 results came in, after which the flow dwindled: 31 between 2 and 3 a.m., 6 between 3 and 4 a.m. It is not known how many boundary changes that have taken place in constituencies since 1951 will affect the announcement of results, but the peak may well be shorter and sharper.

There will be 630 M.P.s in the new House of Commons, five more than were elected in 1951. There are 35 new constituencies and 385 where boundary changes have taken place, 410 are unaltered. In announcing the results the designations 'New Division' and 'Altered Division' will be used, and it will not be possible to make a statement of party gains and losses in these constituencies.

A country-wide network of communications has been set up to link the BBC's six Regions, and observers in the party headquarters, will report on the notable features of Election Day. At 10.15 p.m. the Home Service and Light Programme join forces, and before the result comes through the BBC's Midland Region will be a short programme in which the method of announcing results and the techniques of assessment will be explained.

During the night from 10.30 p.m. until close-down at 4 a.m. results will be broadcast as received, the state of the parties will be given at every quarter-hour, and considered assessments of results and trends will be broadcast when needful. The Light Programme only will broadcast a special fifteen-minute edition of Radio Newsreel at 1 a.m. and from time to time, before dawn, will relay broadcasts from outside commentary points in widely scattered constituencies. On Friday morning, to assist breakfast-listeners, a summary of the 4 a.m. assessment will be repeated in the Home Service at 7.10 a.m. and 8.10 a.m. before counting is resumed. At 9.10 a.m. the start of Housewives' Choice will be delayed to accommodate a twenty-minute Radio Newsreel which will bring a special fifteen-minute edition of Radio Newsreel at 1 a.m. and from time to time, before dawn, will relay broadcasts from outside commentary points in widely scattered constituencies.

The main flow of results on Friday should begin about the middle of the morning and by lunch-time the picture may have changed considerably. The general situation will be brought up to date in a special survey from 11.30 to 12 p.m., in both the Home Service and Light Programme.

The final stage of the operation will be reached at 9.15 p.m. on Friday, when the Home Service will broadcast an extended edition of its regular current affairs series At Home and Abroad. This will contain authoritative comments on the final result, interviews with politicians, personalities, and a special section devoted to overseas reactions.

Professor Maurice Kendall, who holds the Chair of Statistics in the University of London, will lead a team of statisticians who will study results as they come in and assess trends. They will make use of computing machines installed in Broadcasting House, and in addition they will have at their disposal, for the first time at an Election in this country, an electronic computer that is among the fastest in the world. The use of this intricate machine has involved much careful preparation under Professor Kendall’s supervision, and because it cannot be moved to London an O.B. operation has been planned in conjunction with the BBC's Midlands Region. Throughout Election Night the team in broadcasting House will be in touch with their opposite number in charge of the ‘brain.’

To this ‘back-room’ assessment of Election statistics will be added carefully prepared political analysis compiled with the help of Noel Annan, Lecturer in Politics in the University of Cambridge. Then, in the ‘front line,’ will be a team of broadcasters already well known to the listening public, whose task will be to write and broadcast the commentaries. The team will include Andrew Shonfield, Honor Balfour, Walter James, and Cyril Ray, with William Hartley at the headquarters of the electronic computing Tidals, another facility will be direct lines between Broadcasting House and the national headquarters of the three main parties in London. The commentaries will not be allowed to hold up the announcement of constituency results. Despite the complex nature of the network, as soon as a commentator knows that a new result has come through he or she will be off the air within sixty seconds.

ON THE TELEVISION SCREEN

THIRTY-SEVEN cameras, sixteen more than were used during the Coronation, will be employed by the BBC Television Service to cover the General Election results. With outside broadcasts planned from some eighteen centres—including Edinburgh, Manchester, Cardiff, Cheltenham, and Bristol—the Service will again show election scenes and declarations of poll. At 9.10 on Thursday night Richard Dimbleby will introduce the studio team of expert analysts: David Butler, author of The British General Election 1951, who took part in the last General Election broadcasting, and Cyril Ray, with William Hartley at the headquarters of the electronic computing Tidals. Another facility will be direct lines between Broadcasting House and the national headquarters of the three main parties in London. The commentaries will not be allowed to hold up the announcement of constituency results. Despite the complex nature of the network, as soon as a commentator knows that a new result has come through he or she will be off the air within sixty seconds.

Michael Balfour, Deputy Head of News Output, News Division, will be in charge of information in Studio D. The studio will be the information unit and will contain microphones. This is to enable the messengers, caption artists, sub-editors, and checkers to talk at will without any of their comments going on the air. Results will be filled in on slips which already bear the name of the constituency, candidates, etc. The slips are matched with caption cards bearing the same information and taken to caption artists who use quick-drying paint to fill in the figures. The cards are then taken to studio attendants who place them on easels before the camera. Meanwhile duplicate slips are taken to statisticians working with slide rules to tabulate the overall figures and to assistants who transcribe the individual results into squares on a map of the British Isles and into additions to other diagrams.

Two studios at Lime Grove, D and E, will be used for the operation. D will be the information studio and will contain no microphones. This is to enable the messengers, caption artists, sub-editors, and checkers to talk at will without any of their comments going on the air. Results will be filled in on slips which already bear the name of the constituency, candidates, etc. The slips are matched with caption cards bearing the same information and taken to caption artists who use quick-drying paint to fill in the figures. The cards are then taken to studio attendants who place them on easels before the camera. Meanwhile duplicate slips are taken to statisticians working with slide rules to tabulate the overall figures and to assistants who transcribe the individual results into squares on a map of the British Isles and into additions to other diagrams.

Michael Balfour, Deputy Head of News Output, News Division, will be in charge of information in Studio D. Cameras in both studios will be controlled from the gallery of Studio D by the producer, Grace Wendharn Goldie, BBC Assistant Director, who was in charge of the operation in 1950 and 1951, and associate producer Michael Peacock. They will also be in direct touch with all the outside broadcast units.

Transmission will continue through the night until approximately 4 a.m. on Friday and will be resumed again at 6 a.m. Results will again be shown as they come in and there will be interviews, outside broadcasts, and expert analyses throughout the day. If decisive results should still be coming in on Friday afternoon, Children’s Television may be interrupted; at 6 p.m. there will be a brief survey and at 7.45 a final review.
'Radio Times' Chart for Recording the
BROADCAST ELECTION RESULTS

This is a complete list of the United Kingdom's 630 Borough and County constituencies, arranged in alphabetical order for listeners who wish to record the results as they are broadcast on Thursday and Friday. Constituencies are shown in the form in which their names will be announced over the air.

With each constituency in this list is the name of the Party which won the seat and its majority at the last General Election. Subsequent By-Election figures are given in brackets.

There have been boundary changes in a number of constituencies since the last election and in these cases no figures are given. Minor boundary changes are marked thus &; major changes thus ---; new constituencies are marked 'New'.

The early days of autumn brought the Gypsies to the ranch and Kate found it hard to keep away from them. Something interesting was always going on in their camp. After dark they would sit round the fire singing strange, sad songs. At night the soft, sweet tune of their battered violins would lull Kate to sleep, little did she realise that they would bring her the biggest and most frightening adventure of her life.
